

Commitment

Sadly, I do believe that the statement “men are more likely to flee from commitment than women,” is true. I have noticed that men have a girlfriend and are almost always the ones to cheat first. In my opinion, cheating is not acceptable under any circumstances. In fact, a boy I really liked one time had a girlfriend and tried to kiss me. Even though I thought he was so cute and so sweet I didn't let him kiss me because I don't support cheating one bit. I feel like about half of the guys can't be with just one girl. They always feel the need to flee from a commitment to find a younger, prettier girl to be with until a new one comes along. The first person I interviewed was my grandma Dorothy. She is 77 years old and not married. When I asked my grandma about the statement, she about screamed in the phone, “That is just pish posh.” And, if you don't know what that means, it means that she doesn't agree in the slightest bit. She told me how she thinks that as the generations have went on the girls have changed and have become the ones more likely to cheat on their significant other. I was shocked by my grandma's response. Although her second husband cheated on her, she still believed that women were more likely to flee from commitment. She went on to say that all women these days are after are looks and money. The second person I asked about this statement was my cousin, Brandt Ipson. He firmly agreed with the statement that men are more likely to cheat. About half of his friends, at one time or another, have cheated on their girlfriend. He explained that men like to have a new spark. Once they get sick of their girlfriend, they find another girl that gives them the first time butterflies. As you can see, each and every one of us had our own opinion about the statement. Just like any other scenario, you can't really define who is right about it.